References Category:Microsoft Office Category:Windows 10WASHINGTON -- President Bush's immigration order would have barred job applicants who are most likely to be immigrants from entering the country, an interpretation that supporters said was consistent with the law. But the Supreme Court ruled yesterday that the government could not classify certain immigrant applicants based on the religion of their spouses. The justices found that Executive Order No. 6 (download here in PDF format) violated the U.S. Constitution's ban on unreasonable religious discrimination. Justice Antonin Scalia's majority opinion allowed the government to continue to require that foreign job applicants obtain a U.S. employer's consent before entering the country. The ruling concerned a provision of the Immigration and Nationality Act, known as the Immigration and Nationality Technical Corrections Act. The law allows the Department of Homeland Security, which has interpreted the provision on religious discrimination to include spouses, to register religious objections against foreign nationals on a case-by-case basis. But the Supreme Court ruled that such decisions would have to be "objective and disinterested," a standard that the court found the government failed to meet. "The government can't enforce an explicit discrimination against people of a particular religion," said John C. Eastman, director of the Center for Constitutional Jurisprudence at the Cato Institute. Supporters of the Bush order described it as a policy carefully crafted to avoid discrimination against immigrants based on their religion. They said the provision requiring the government's consent before letting in immigrants whose spouses hold U.S. citizenship would
